Notes for the Teacher:

The idea behind having students write a news report or fake news story is to learn how to write effective news reports.

For this activity, students can look at the photo and invent a news report (forest fire local or global, local fireman story, house evacuation) or research something (Twin Towers, actual fire that happened).

To introduce the activity, show some photos and have students brainstorm what the news behind the photo could be. I may be worth reading a few news reports to observe the following requirements of news reports.

Review the requirements to write an effective news report:

- News is written quite formally and in a serious tone as it is a factual account of an event
- News is written in past tense as it has already happened
- News is written in the 3rd person
- News headlines capture the reader's attention, remember, the headline and photo almost convey the event
- News paragraphs are usually short and include details about the event
- News reports often contain quotes
- News almost always answers the questions Who, What, When, Where, Why and How which are usually answered at the beginning of the news report in the leading paragraph
- News is written clearly with easy to read clear and concise language
- News reports will contain transition words to link the sequence of events
- News reports should be written with an unbiased tone

In Summary— have students present their news report and have the audience determine whether it's true or fake. Audience should be prepared to state why they feel the story is fake or true.
